

B.S. (Billy Rosa, September)

Billy is not very aware of what exactly is his illness. The team says things like 'something in the stomach', and he said clearly that he's a person who likes to know things.

He's a palliative care worker, so it's very wierd for him to be 'in the other side'. For him, since he's working from home now, to be at the hospital is very very bad, he misses a lot his stuff, his home, the place he feels safe. He has art works at home, it's colorful, there's much light, he uses to listen to piano music, he likes to write a lot and he misses his dog, Ellas, a very cute dog.

Kindness is the most important value for him, and he said that is a value that is far away from him at the hospital. "People come, take my blood, look at my body, and I even don't know their story. I'd like them to know that I matter. I matter just as much as the people they love."

The most important relationship for him is with his husband, Michael, to whom he's married for 8 years, but they're together already for 15 years. This is all for him. Michael is all for him. When asked about how is his faith, he said: "I was raised in the catholical church, and it was not very easy for me. I have faith in people, love for me is the most important thing."

He's worried about not having enough time, he loves his life, he's afraid of dying. And if he could leave the hospital today, he would just stay at his home, take a walk at the park, simple things.
